I would like to prevent my instructor from being able to hear the sound of the tapes' mechanism; I know that this is most likely not possible, but I do not want to leave the tapes sitting in the recorder for too long, as they might be damaged. I use a Shure PSM-600 on an Audio-Technica AT-80 microphone and the Zoom H4n digital recorder. I would like to know what is the best way to do this. I am only using analogue sound, so I don't have to worry about the noise floor. A: First off, you don't need to worry about the noise floor. The noise floor is not a noise per se but rather a way of finding the "worst case" where the noise is worst. You could set the recording level to the maximum that will work on your tapes (i.e. the broken tape driver could screw up your recording) and the noise floor would be the quietest that still works. To the point of noise getting into the recording, there are two things you could do. The first is to get an external microphone. I don't know how you would do this with your particular recorder, but if it had an XLR connector, then you could use a condenser microphone like the Blue Yeti which picks up the whole room but will have a very low noise floor. The second is to use the internal microphone. The PSM-600 has a dedicated microphone level control so you would set that to your input level.
